Notes:

Even though the trip is in April, water temps are cold and a good breeze coming off the water can drop the air temperature lower than expected.

One way to regulate body temperature is to wear the right clothing and layer your clothing properly. Clothing items should be kept versatile enough to meet various seasonal and weather conditions you may encounter. Since each person's body is different, experiment to determine your individual requirements.

Minimize your use of cotton clothing. Avoid cotton clothing such like jeans and sweat shirts. Synthetics will keep you warmer and drier than cotton once it gets wet. Wicking shirts and the BSA pants are ideal for camping.

An insulated jacket should keep out wind, rain, and snow and is a very important layer of clothing. If this layer fails, it doesn't matter how good your other garments are, because wet clothing exposed to the wind will chill you quickly no matter form what material it is made.

A good quality rain suit (top and bottom) is important and can make the difference in comfort and safety.
